【模拟题一】Section Ⅲ Translation

It is true that many skilled migrants have been educated and trained partly at the expense of their governments. Some argue that poor countries should therefore rethink how much they spend on higher education.

There are more subtle ways in which the departure of some skilled people may aid poorer countries. Some emigrants would have been jobless had they stayed. Studies have found that unemployment rates among young people with college degrees in poor countries are several multiples of those among the poorly educated, perhaps because graduates are more demanding.

The possibility of emigration may even have beneficial effects on those who choose to stay, by giving people in poor countries an incentive to invest in education. Migrants can also affect their home country directly. Some Indians in Silicon Valley helped Indian software companies break into the American market. Migrants may return home, often with skills that would have been hard to pick up had they never gone abroad.
